Don't Pursue a False Economy

We live in difficult times. The "GFC" has taken its toll on the banks, business and ultimately the public.

So, it's perfectly sensible to look at reducing your overheads, by eliminating unnecessary waste and expenditure.

If this is you, you might decide that pursuing accident recovery claims is best handled "in-house". This might be all well and good, but just like re-using an old gasket, we would suggest, a "false economy".

Why?

There are many reasons.

As an operator, your core business is to acquire and maintain a fleet of cars, and to court suitable drivers and licence owners to work with you. Or if you are a small operator, you are out on the road, at the "coal face".

We would suggest that all of this leaves you with precious little time to spend with family or friends, or just recovering from the hectic week prior, let alone pursuing all the paperwork and time necessary to make recovery.

And as we have blogged in the past, our experience is that the best way to make recovery time and time again is to act QUICKLY.

So does your hectic schedule really allow you the necessary time for pursuit of accident claims? If it does, then that is great news for you. But what if the claim involves a tricky or difficult situation?

There is an old saying..."man who represent self have fool for client..." We aren't of course saying that you are foolish, but you get our drift.....

We believe that by having expert representation for all accident claims recoveries, you will be BETTER OFF, because you will be recovering your losses, AND focussing on running your business in the best way possible.

Further, your risk is greatly reduced by our "no win no fee" policy on accident claims. Now there's something to think about.
